Presentations and peer feedback

Aims

To deliver your presentations to your peers.

To consider elements of effective feedback to peers.

Feedback

Likert scales are used to determine effectiveness.

They are useful for all forms of observation and research.

2. On a scale of poor to exceptional, consider how well your peers have completed the activity.

	Poor	Fair	Good	Very good	Exceptional
Presentation skills
Digital media
Communication skills
Knowledge of the topic
Organised and prepared
Presentation skills

You will determine a rating for each of your peers. Remember to consider each statement separately. This is preparing you to give each other feedback in the Employer Set Project, which is essential for the next step in the project that requires you to detail suggested changes to your care plan.

Feedback – SWAN method

Strengths – This is where you can inform your peers about what they have done really well. Consider what impressed you, areas of the presentation you really enjoyed or skills that were performed well. Examples are presentation skills, use of digital media and knowledge demonstrated.

Weaknesses – These are areas that could have been better. Examples are not maintaining eye contact, reading the presentation aloud word for word rather than talking around it and providing insufficient detail on the topic.

And

Next steps – These are areas to focus on next time. What would you suggest they improve for the next presentation?

Group discussion – can we agree a few points?

Peer feedback can be difficult.

You are not being mean.

You are not trying to hurt or upset someone.

This is a crucial element of your Employer Set Project. You may struggle with the next stage if you do not receive feedback from your peers and they may struggle if you do not give feedback to them. Therefore, you are learning a skill that enables you to support each other.
